Parent Statement of Support

At YES, our goal is to help teens grow into successful adults. Specifically, we focus on the skills that can be taught through an early work experience. We are committed to teaching and modeling the norms of an adult workplace, which is why we focus most of our communication directly on the teens in our program. But the truth is, the cooperation and support of parents and caregivers is invaluable to us as we help teens learn and grow. Over the years, we've had a lot of conversations with parents and caregivers about how to best support their child as they work through YES. Many parents want their children to demonstrate more independence, but are unsure of how to support them.

We developed the following guidelines for parent/caregiver support so that you and your child can have a better sense of what our expectations are of the teens that work with our program.

- If your child is sick or otherwise unable to come into work, they should be the ones to call YES and their worksite supervisors unless they are physically unable to do so. If your child is having an issue at work, they should be the ones to talk with YES/their worksite supervisor. Please encourage them to reach out to us before calling on their behalf.
- If you have a question or concern about your child's work experience, schedule, etc. please reach out to the YES Staff and allow us to liaison with the business/worksite in question. Parents should not be communicating directly with worksite supervisors except in unique/emergency circumstances.
- YES Jobs are real jobs. Teens are hired, and they can be fired. Help your child respect the reality of their job commitment by placing value and importance on their attendance and effort. As much as possible, appointments and trips should be scheduled outside of work hours, and teens are responsible for communicating with their supervisors to get absences excused ahead of time.
- Encourage participation in training activities. One of the things that makes working with YES unique is the opportunity to learn more about job success through our summer workshops. Teens are paid to learn about financial literacy, resume building, customer service, and more. Encourage your child to take advantage of this rare opportunity.
- Talk about work with your child. Ask them what they're learning, what they like/dislike, what they wish they knew before they started. Conversations will help them build clarity about the experience and solidify what they are learning.

I have read and understand the following guidelines and will do my best to support my child through their work experience with YES.
